Question:

Living in a country where you have to speak a foreign language can cause serious social problems, as well as practical problems. To what extent do you agree or not agree with this statement?

Answer:

These days, an increasing number of immigrants have appeared in developed countries. While some of them adapt to the ~~their~~ new environments in no time, the rest of the people ~~find it difficult to~~/hardly fit in with the new culture. Personally, I hold ~~the~~/my view that living in a foreign country where your mother tongue is not widely used can lead to both social and practical problems.

In the first place, subpar speakers are not fluent in ~~their~~ new languages and they can not articulate themselves clearly on a daily basis. This is very likely to cause misunderstandings ~~during/in terms of/in the course of~~/through communication, meanwhile, frustrating the speakers themselves. For instance, a non-native speaker often ~~gets~~/feels headaches ~~oi~~ in an occasion ~~/in a situation~~ where ~~ne~~ they really need a haircut. As they have never learned about how to talk with a barber, a trip to the barbershop is prone to be an experience of total awkwardness. Furthermore, such is human nature, people are more willing to talk with those who have a similar background to them. Non-native speakers not only face a tough situation when they have to speak but also in cases ~~when they need~~ to understand other people, in that they lack the knowledge to understand the points behind idioms and jokes. The disadvantages of communicating often result in a higher risk of unemployment and fewer friends that they can talk to.

Overall, despite the fact that immigration can provide ~~individuals/people-~~with better physical conditions, the social atmosphere for such immigrants ~~is~~ are not inviting and ~~can~~ even ~~be/appear~~ hostile. Thus, I suppose that living in a foreign country ~~can cause someone~~ has more harm than good.

Comment: Excellent work, Supperdanny! For your reference, 'supper' means dinner. You might wish to change your name to Superdanny. Just a suggestion. In any case, your work is excellent and please note the few recommended adjustments and/or revisions. Best wishes.
